

Never Been Conned

a comedy sketch idea by Jonathan D Steinhoff ©1.30.19

In a world where a con artist can even grow up to be president, parents want their teenagers' first / virgin experience being conned to be special, so that as they go forward in life perhaps they'll become more astute in this area, possibly even maturing to where they know how not to be conned when there's a presidential election to vote in.

A con artist brothel becomes the perfect scene for this first experience. In the brothel various con artists are brought out to parade themselves in front of the parents and their teens. Parents have little questions for those con artists who have "somehow" caught their interest, as they work towards picking their teens' first.

We find several couples are in a semi-traumatized, frenetic state over how horrible Trump turned out to be, they are at a serious loss as to how they could have been so duped, it rattles them to their core, they are terrified to even think that the same thing will someday happen to their children. The perhaps out of left field, absurd sounding questions these couples ask the con artists in the brothel are blurted out in an emotionally unstable manner, reflecting the state to which their error in voting in this instance has driven them. Certain con artist answers prompt the parents to suddenly look probingly into their teens' eyes, trying to get a sense of how susceptible they are to becoming infected. It must never happen again, ever. It's like the end of the world.
